Industry Distribution

Market Outlook

The Hang Seng Index (HSI) extended its rally from mid-October through mid-November, reaching a high of 27,000 before retreating by 4.5% to close the month near 26,000. Over the past two months, the HSI has faced notable pressure due to the sustained strength of the U.S. dollar and a sharp decline in market expectations for a Fed rate cut in December—now estimated at around 30%. This has created a tighter liquidity environment, weighing on Hong Kong dollar-denominated assets. In addition, technology stocks such as Alibaba-W and Xiaomi have underperformed, further dampening sentiment. Despite these near-term challenges, the market retains a solid foundation for medium-term stabilization. We believe investors should remain focused on underlying fundamentals rather than short-term sentiment swings.

Commentary

While the HSI posted a modest decline in November, our fund recorded a 2.5% negative return, primarily due to weakness in the technology sector. In response, we adjusted our IT stock portfolio by shifting exposure to software and AI-related technologies, electric vehicles, and biomedicine, while reducing positions in gold mining and reallocating toward downstream retail to better navigate market volatility.

Despite recent sentiment-driven reversals, the fund has outperformed the HSI by nearly 15% since its inception in 2022. Looking ahead, we will continue to apply our quantitative and fundamental stock selection approach and maintain a balanced allocation strategy to capture long-term opportunities.
